Fund Report (Dec 2022)

Market Outlook

November saw a positive turn in the twin challenges China had been facing: a beleaguered property market and stringent pandemic policies that weighed on economic activities. Following the launch of the country's "three arrows" package of credit, bond and equity financing, our investment teams expected China's property market could see less liquidity stress moving forward. Although there will be a lag effect before property sales can regain momentum, we believe China's relaxation on its pandemic requirement could eventually buoy home sales. Our investment teams will continue to gauge how the supportive measures will be implemented and keep a close eye on the market development.

The easing of mobility curbs spurred hopes that the country could be on the road to economic recovery, and riskier assets may gradually attract inflow, supporting the Renminbi.

Investment Strategy

In face of a spate of favourable property policies, the investment teams added beta positions through high-yield property bonds. The fund remained neutral on RMB at the moment and do not overweight USD as we believe the greenback's one-sided strength is coming to an end given the rate hike cycle began to tail off.

Reopening measures and reflation theme are factors that could possibly send onshore bond yields higher, prompting the fund to maintain underweight in RMB duration on rising yield expectations. In November, the PBOC cut reserve requirement ratio for most banks by 25bps, injecting liquidity into the market to stimulate growth. We expect China's monetary policy will stay accommodative to support the economy.
